The project aims to connect doctoral researchers working in the field of Old Norse studies across the 4EU+ Alliance and to create a sustainable platform for academic exchange and collaboration. By bringing together PhD students from different disciplinary backgrounds, the project seeks to enrich existing approaches to the study of the medieval North, foster interdisciplinary dialogue, and explore new perspectives on history, language, literature, religion, and culture.

The project brings together Charles University, Sorbonne University, and the University of Copenhagen, each contributing distinct expertise to the study of Old Norse and medieval Scandinavian culture. Sorbonne University has a strong profile in the study of medieval religion, the University of Copenhagen is internationally recognised for its work in Old Norse linguistics, and Charles University combines traditional philological approaches with innovative perspectives such as gender studies. The initiative builds on academic networks established through previous research visits and scholarly exchanges between the partner institutions.

The research and training activities are designed to encourage dialogue between doctoral students working on related topics from different methodological traditions. Through the exchange of ideas and critical feedback, participants will have the opportunity to refine their research, broaden their perspectives, and identify common areas of interest that may form the basis for future collaborative projects within the 4EU+ framework. A central objective of the project is to strengthen interdisciplinary approaches to the study of the medieval North and to explore the relevance of Old Norse and medieval themes in contemporary academic discussions. By connecting perspectives from philology, history, linguistics, religious studies, and cultural studies, the project contributes to a deeper understanding of European cultural heritage and intellectual traditions.

The main output of the project will be a three-day workshop hosted by Charles University in Prague, bringing together doctoral students and established scholars from the participating universities. The workshop will provide participants with valuable feedback on their ongoing research and create opportunities for long-term academic cooperation. In addition, two participating students will contribute to regular teaching activities at Charles University, enriching the educational experience of both undergraduate and postgraduate students.

Through academic mobility, research-based education, and international collaboration, the project aims to strengthen the network of emerging scholars in Old Norse studies within the 4EU+ Alliance and support the future professional development of young researchers across Europe.
